The simplicity of a sustainable economy

In times of economic crisis you have to do as I learnt from some fair traders.

They didn't have jobs but they wanted to work, they were five people. Each of this group of friends had something even though they were all poor. So they sold what they didn't need and bought a truck. Then

One knew where the best market was to go to get fruit and vegetables and another had experience in loading and unloading trucks and the driver's wife arranged all the paperwork and they all got up at three in the morning and every day they went to sell at neighbourhood fairs and shared the money equally and worked happily. That's how they asked to get out of a crisis and that's how it is in all sectors of society. Shall we make a cow? That's what they did.

Everyone loaded and everyone sold, everyone got paid.

If people are taught to think like that by some means. They organise themselves and make a "cow" which is the truck plus the knowledge plus the effort. The unemployed population can be summoned by means of the electricity bill or some state body to form work groups in all areas and then be trained (credit can be provided) Groups of 5 to 8 people for entrepreneurship. Workshops for entrepreneurs.

Then the economy simply becomes sustainable. Some cost more and others less, but this example is aimed at all classes. It is not cooperative. It is making a "cow".

which costs more ingenuity and the results are optimal and you have to know where the market for fruit and vegetables is (3B).

In the end, if you work, you pay and spend what you pay and the results of the state's figures are all in favour of the country.
